Just after the doors had been thrown open for breakfast Harry Brady, the hotel steward, shot Robert Weaver, a calored bell boy, twenty-four years old, who came here from Asheville. Few words had passed between them when Brady fired a bullet into the boy's heart. Brady claims self-defense, but negro servants in the hotel say that Brady was the aggressor, and that Weaver took refuge in the dining room, being followed by Brady, who vowed his purpose to kill him. Brady has retained Judge John W. Price, John S. Ashworth and John Deerhart to defend him. He was arrested and locked up soon after the tragedy. Only one guest was in the dining room at the time of the shooting.
